The Prize Awarded!

Anheuser-Busch Brewing Co.
Wins the Prize at the World's Fair with their
"EAGLE" Brand Beer.

ST. LOUIS, Oct. 28, 1904.
Messrs. Macfarlane & Co., Ltd., Honolulu, H. I.

Dear Sir:—We have mailed you a copy of the Globe-Democrat announcing the great victory won by the ANHEUSER-BUSCH ASSO-CIATION with their "EAGLE" Brand of Beer.

(Signed) ANHEUSER-BUSCH BREWING ASSO-CIATION.

(Special Dispatch to Globe-Democrat.)

St. Louis, Mo., Oct. 28, 1904.
No award has ever been made so justly merited as the one given to-day by the Columbian jury of the World's Fair, consisting of competent and disinterested judges, to the Anheuser-Busch Beer. By methods of unrivalled business enterprise, and by using the best material produced in America and Europe, excluding corn and other adulterants or simulants, the different kinds of the Anheuser-Busch beer have become the favorites with the American people, and have now conquered the highest award in every particular, which had to be considered by the Columbian jury. The high character of the award given today by the jurors will be better understood when it is known that the different beers exhibited by the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association had to compete with hundreds of the most excellent displays of other brewers. The fact that no other concern has received so many points for the various essential qualities of good beer confirms anew the firm's reputation as the leader of all American beers, and Mr. Adolphus Busch can feel proud over this result so justly merited.

The above is a fac-simile of the Label of the "EAGLE" Brand which took the Prize.

In ordering this Beer be sure to ask for the "EAGLE" Brand.

CEDARVILLE SKETCHES.

(WRITTEN FOR THE BULLETIN.)

Dorothy, hidden in the lilacs, overheard his concluding sentence and her face clouded. It jarred upon her finer feelings like a false note in music.

She had had a slight distrust of him before during their acquaintance, and this chance expression seemed to furnish another clew to his character.

In his most earnest conversation there seemed ever to run a mocking undertone that displeased Dorothy, whose life had been passed in the refined and moral atmosphere of a good home whose inmates regarded language solely as a vehicle for conveying their thoughts simply and honestly.

She had been taught from childhood—a motherless childhood—to regard all attempts at equivocation with horror, and she had acquired a habit of speaking with an earnestness and directness that was sometimes embarrassing to her friends, and she had a trick of gazing into the face of whoever she was addressing, with fearless and searching expression in her clear gray eyes, that seemed to penetrate through all the specious outward seeming, in search of the truth, clear into the inner temple of the heart, and to read each tablet bearing the recorded sins or secrets in that Westminster Abbey.
For this Dorothy was a favorite with young and old. Her ready sympathy, her candor, her willingness to assist in any task however irksome, and her never failing tact that always seemed to leave the impression in the minds of her friends that they had conferred a favor upon Dorothy by allowing her to assist or entertain them, made her a cappet with all her acquaintances.

These traits and idiosyncrasies were partly inherent and partly due to her father's care and training.
He had taught her to come to him every night after the lamps were lighted, to talk over unreservedly the events of the day. To him as to a confessor, Dorothy went at even-tide and seated herself on a stool at his feet in the ruddy glow of the hearth fire, poured out her childish troubles, her little picaresques—her hopes and fears and surely never had frail human, faltering out a plaint for pardon or a plea for counsel at the feet of a cowed mercenary so wise or sympathetic a confessor as Dorothy, for the old miller, whose sole interest in life centered in his children after his wife's death, had adopted a moral code that comprised the sum total of all that is of worth in the creeds of Christian or pagan propagandists; to listen to no speech that would sully the purity of his daughters, to utter no word unfit for them to hear, to do no action that he would feel ashamed to have them see, and never to visit any place where they could not enter without being contaminated.
The village matrons, fond of gossip and match-making as most matrons are, declared that young Hubert Ingram, the local banker's son, was going to marry Dora Knowlton, and they invariably added, "She is a sight too good for him with his harum-scarum ways."

Burt, as his friends familiarly called him, was attracted to Dorothy by her pretty face, her innocent truthfulness, and originality. He had lately returned from a term at college and was surprised to find that Dorothy had emerged from the short dress era of girlhood into a very charming young woman, the best, if she was not the prettiest, of all the good and pretty maids of Cedarville.

It is difficult to state with any degree of accuracy where friendly interest ceases and love begins. The young man certainly entertained the profoundest respect and esteem for Dorothy, but his twenty years of life, the major portion of which had been spent in the selfish gratification of his personal pleasures, had made him cynical as well as fickle, and his regard for her had as yet none of the elements of genuine love in it.

Dorothy, in the transition stage between the child and woman, had not attempted until now to analyze her feelings for him. She was startled to find that she experienced a strange pain in learning of this new defect in his character.

She leaned over the wall and spoke at once as was her wont: "I heard you singing down the road. I came and stood in the lilacs and heard what you said about 'lovers and lies.' I am sorry I overheard it—sorry, too, that you said it; I did not intend to surprise a selfcommuning confidence. I would not listen to anything secretly. I hope you believe this—and, Burt, we were good friends at school long ago—when I was just a little girl—tell me now that if you ever do fall in love with anybody—" "Why, Dora, I interrupted, "do you think I could ever love anyone but you?"

"I think you could, Burt; but tell me truly if you would ever tell one whom you loved a falsehood?"

"Well, you see, Dora, that would depend."

"I would rather one told me a truth that hurt than a lie that pleased," she exclaimed.

"You are quixotic; it would not do to tell all the truth always. But there is your supper bell, Dora. I will be back at eight o'clock to have a chat with you." The Wiltons have got back and I'm going over to see whether the European tour has made Cyril a muf and Maud a nunny" and raising his cap with a jaunty air of mock deference he sauntered on, whistling "Come into the garden, Maud," and Dorothy, hearing, sighed audibly as she picked up her half-filled berry baskets and started for the house.
